Expect the Unexpected

The old saying 'expect the unexpected' certainly applies to the state of the Canadian financial markets as of late. At the beginning of this year, the Bank of Canada held a bearish view of the Canadian economy. Continuing low oil prices, slower economic growth and concerns over the effects of U.S. protectionism painted a less than optimistic picture for Canada's economic prosperity.

By the summer, this outlook had changed substantially. Based on improved economic data, the Bank of Canada expressed its confidence in Canada's economic prospects and raised the target overnight interest rate for the first time in seven years in July. Despite continuing low oil prices, Canadian economic data exceeded expectations for the first half of the year and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) now predicts that Canada will have the fastest GDP growth of the G7 countries.

Investors are confronted with a changing investment landscape compared to just six months ago. With the key interest rate again increased in September, we have entered a rising interest rate environment, albeit one in which rates are expected to gradually rise. Since May, the Canadian dollar has strengthened, largely due to improved economic growth and rising interest rates, which make Canadian dollar deposits more attractive.

Despite the more positive news, the Canadian equity market has been sluggish since the start of the year. But consider this perspective: Over the past 30 years, the more substantial gains of the S&P/TSX Composite Index (with dividends reinvested) of 5 percent or more were made in just 11 percent of those 360 months. In fact, the index actually fell in almost 40 percent of the months, demonstrating just how common downward market movements are.¹

At the same time, the impact of lower oil prices cannot be overlooked. The energy sector makes up about 20 percent of the S&P/TSX Composite Index. The sector's dominance, second only to the financial sector at 34.5 percent, should remind us that the Canadian stock market isn't highly diversified by sector.² But, that doesn't mean your portfolio shouldn't be.

Savvy investors should feel more at ease because a well-constructed portfolio uses diversification to help temper the effects of change and mitigate downside risks. Diversification is also meant to protect your portfolio during the inevitable periods of volatility. And, volatility should be expected as a normal part of the market cycle, especially when we are later in the cycle.

Expect the unexpected and continue to look forward, focusing your attention on your personal objectives and your longer-term plan. In these final months of the year, please let me know if I can be of assistance. Have a wonderful autumn.

Final Months of the Year

Year-End Reminders: Save Tax!

Is it too early to think about the year end? If you are considering tax-planning strategies, not at all. In fact, now may be a good time to take steps to minimize your 2017 taxes. Tax planning continues to be an important part of investing, especially as the government has raised taxes on higher-income earners over recent years. Here are a few considerations:

If you are 65 years old...

You are eligible for the pension income tax credit. This allows a taxpayer to claim a non-refundable tax credit on up to $2,000 of eligible pension income. If you don't have any pension income, generate some for yourself. Move a small portion of your registered Retirement Savings Plan (RSP) assets into a registered Retirement Income Fund (RIF). You can then withdraw $2,000 each year until you convert your RSP and start drawing "regular" income. This may be a great way to effectively withdraw RSP funds on a tax-efficient basis.

If you are 71 years old...

Convert your RSP before year end. You have several options, including converting to a RIF or annuity, or taking all or a portion in cash (subject to taxes at your marginal tax rate). We can help with the decision. However, the process of transferring accounts can take time, so don't leave the decision until the last minute. Also, consider making a final RSP contribution. Note that this must be done by December 31, 2017 instead of March 1, 2018.

At any age...

Consider maximizing your charitable donations, especially if you haven't claimed them on your previous tax returns. Remember, this is the last year of the First-Time Donor's Super Tax Credit (FDSC), which provides an additional 25 percent credit for first-time donors on up to $1,000 of donations. The FDSC is generally available to an individual if neither (s)he nor his/her spouse/common-law partner has claimed and been allowed a charitable donation tax credit for any year after 2007. Eligible donations must be made by year end.

Make Registered Education Savings Plan contributions.

While contributions are not tax-deductible, the end of year deadline may be important to take advantage of the Canada Education Savings Grants, which can then be invested on a tax-deferred basis.

Make RSP contributions for the 2017 year. You still have until 60 days after the end of the calendar year to make a contribution to save on 2017 taxes.

Use capital losses to offset capital gains. Before year end, you may be considering the sale of certain non-registered investments which are in a loss position. Keep in mind that realizing such losses may provide potential tax benefits, where they can be used to offset taxable capital gains. Care must be taken when doing this, and the assistance of a professional may be beneficial.

Our Longevity: No Limits to How Long We Can Live?

Although the average Canadian life expectancy is around 82 years old, more Canadians — 8,230, according to the most recent census — are living to over 100 years of age. Up until recently, researchers believed that the maximum human lifespan was about 115 years old. But according to a recent study, Canadian researchers have shown that there is no plateau in human life, and the human lifespan can be expected to climb far into the foreseeable future.¹

Do You Have Financial Longevity? It's Never Too Late

Our lifespans are continuing to grow, which should remind us of the importance of having a wealth plan that prepares us for many years into the future. After all, your investment outlook period might be longer than you think. Consider that an 80-year-old investor could have 20 additional years of investing ahead.

A Little Can Go a Long Way

As you consider the future, don't underestimate the impact of time and compounded growth on even small amounts that are saved and invested. The chart below shows how small monthly contributions can grow in significance in just a matter of years (illustrative only, assuming a five percent compounded annual rate of return):

Time Period	$100 / month	$150 / month	$250 / month
5 Years	$6,801	$10,201	$17,002
10 Years	$15,528	$23,292	$38,821
25 Years	$59,551	$89,326	$148,877
45 Years	$202,644	$303,966	$506,609

Three Questions to Ask Aging Parents

Talking with aging parents about estate planning is not easy. It is a subject that can evoke discomfort, perhaps because it is a reminder of our mortality or it involves the private topic of finances. However, ensuring that elderly parents have an estate plan in place is important, so that they will be well cared for into the future. It can also help to potentially avoid future complications, such as the need for court intervention or acrimonious disputes between family members.

Experts in this area often suggest starting with casual conversations to help to establish whether or not a basic estate plan has been put in place, or to identify the need for support. Here are some conversation starters that may help you to approach the subject and lead to meaningful discussions:

1. Who do you wish to make decisions for you, if you are unable? This question may help to uncover whether or not the necessary documents have been prepared in the event of illness or incapacity, such as Power of Attorney documents (the name and applicable laws vary by province). It is important for parents to identify people that they trust while they are still able, especially to try and prevent elder abuse. This may also generate a discussion about how parents wish to be cared for into the future.

2. Have you spoken to a lawyer about an estate plan? This question may help to determine whether a will exists. If not, this may be the time to encourage creating one. Parents should also be reminded that estate planning goes beyond having a will. It may take into consideration tax planning to maximize wealth, or involve creating a plan for parents to maintain control of their money until they no longer can. If a plan exists, it may be helpful to discuss the location of the will and other financial information.

3. How do you wish to be remembered? Many adult children have never talked to their parents about how they would like to be remembered, what is important to them or what they wish to be their legacy. It's not just about finances. This may generate discussion in other areas, such as philanthropy. Are there causes important to the parent, or ways to leave a lasting legacy?

Seek Advice

These are just a few questions that may help to talk about estate planning with parents. They are by no means meant to be comprehensive. Please seek the advice of an estate planning specialist if you are looking for guidance.

Students Now Back in School

Still Don't Have an RESP?

With students back at school, the cost of higher education may be top of mind. Are you prepared? The average Canadian university tuition has risen to over $6,300 per year. Combined with room/board, books and other incidentals, a year at university can cost in excess of $20,000!¹ Without planning, this can result in crippling student loans, a poor legacy for graduation. As such, it is important to make use of all of the tools available to help ease the cost of education. Yet, according to Statistics Canada, around half of Canadian families still do not have a Registered Education Savings Plan (RESP).²

One of the main reasons to consider an RESP is that funds grow on a tax-deferred basis within the plan. Assets may be invested in a wide range of securities. Although contributions are not tax-deductible, when investment income and government grants are eventually paid out for approved educational purposes they are generally taxed in the hands of the student beneficiary. This may result in reduced taxes, if any, as the student will likely be taxed in a lower marginal tax bracket. The RESP can also promote gradual and steady savings, which may benefit from compounded growth over time.

CESGs: A "Guaranteed Return"

A key feature of the RESP is that the government offers the Canada Education Savings Grant (CESG), equal to 20 percent of the contribution made, to a maximum of $500 per beneficiary per year (or $1,000, if there is unused contribution room from the previous year). The CESG is available until the end of the calendar year in which the beneficiary turns 17 and certain conditions apply. CESGs offer a potential lifetime benefit of $7,200 per beneficiary provided by the government, which shouldn't be overlooked.

Did You Know?

- RESPs can be set up by grandparents. If parents do not have current financial means, this may be a great way to access CESGs for the beneficiary during the age qualification period.
- RESPs can generally be set up at any age to take advantage of tax-deferred growth (some family plans may have restrictions). However, older beneficiaries may not be entitled to the CESG.

The Family Cottage or Cabin: Binding or Breaking the Family

With the cooler weather now here, the summer cottage and cabin season has largely wound down for the year. A seasonal family property often creates many happy memories, but it can also be a source of much angst down the road. Have you given thought to how the property may be passed along in the future?

If you have a cottage or cabin, here are some questions to ask today, which may potentially uncover challenges as you plan for its succession:

Who will inherit the property?

Many lawyers say that the family cottage or cabin can be one of the most divisive aspects of an estate plan. The property often has a strong emotional attachment for those family members who have spent many summers growing up there. As such, there is the likely potential for family fights, even between siblings who may have good relationships. If you have multiple children, will you leave the property to them all? Or, perhaps, not all of the children will want the cottage or cabin — in which case, if you wish to equalize your estate for all beneficiaries, how will you manage this?

Will there be tax liabilities?

Unless the cottage/cabin is designated as your principal residence, there will likely be tax consequences if the value of the property has increased over time. This is because it will be deemed to have been sold just prior to death, unless it passes to a surviving spouse, and the estate will be responsible for any capital gains taxes, which may be substantial. If the estate does not have sufficient liquid assets to fund such taxes, beneficiaries may be forced to sell the property to cover these taxes owing. There are a variety of estate planning strategies that can be built into an estate plan to help cover the tax liabilities, but proper planning is necessary.

How will the property be managed on an ongoing basis?

If you decide to leave a property jointly to multiple children, there may be complications. Siblings may not be able to agree on how the property is shared for usage. One sibling may live close to the property, but others may feel left out if they live on the other side of the country. There may also be disagreements on what a modern cottage/cabin may look like. One adult child may love the cottage/cabin as long as he or she doesn't have to spend any money on it, while another may wish to spend money and renovate. In some cases, it may not be practical for siblings to jointly own the property.

Where to Start

A good place to start is by having a discussion with your children to understand their wishes and vision for the property, prior to determining the best course of action within your estate plan. In the least, having a dialogue can help to prepare your children for what may be to come as you make your plan for the future. Seek the advice of legal and tax advisors who have expertise in this area, as they will be able to provide counsel as it relates to your own situation. With some forward planning, the memory of a cottage or cabin as a place that binds the family together may be preserved.
